

Business Partners gain from partnerships

Although partnerships between business and education are established primarily to benefit learners, businesses also benefit directly.

Business and community agencies benefit from:

- an enhanced community image and improved public relations through demonstrated social responsibility.
- employee's improved interpersonal and communication skills through student and teacher interaction and facilitated access to life-long learning opportunities provided by the Board.
- access to school resources, facilities and personnel with specific reference to career counselling, educational upgrading, technical equipment including computer laboratories, report writing, language development, translation service, recreational facilities, etc.
- a heightened awareness amongst young people and educators of the economy and the demands of the private enterprise system.
- an enhanced interest in and understanding of business amongst students.
- improved insight into the current educational system including its strengths and limitations.
- an enriched resource pool of informed, skilled and educated students who will be the future work force.
- the innovative ideas and contagious energy which young people bring to their partnering community enterprises
- improved productivity and product quality resulting from education, training improvements and the personal enrichment of involved employees.

Shouldn't your business be involved in an educational partnership?